Relationship between stepper machine use and health-related quality of life in older adults with pulmonary diseases. Little is known about the effects of resistance training in older adults. The aim of the present study was to evaluate the influence of resistance exercise on health-related quality of life. Fifty-eight individuals aged 65-75 years participated in a program that consisted of two strength training sessions per week for 16 weeks. The effects of the program on the health-related quality of life were evaluated by using the Medical Outcome Study Short Form 36 Health Survey. Exercise performance was assessed by using the 30-m walk test and a stepper machine test. Participation in the program was associated with improvements in the Short Form 36 Physical Component Summary and subscales of the Short Form 36 (role-emotional, social functioning, vitality, and mental health). The improvements in the strength test and the physical performance test were stronger in the subjects who had higher Short Form 36 Physical Component Summary values. These results provide evidence that participation in a resistance training program may improve health-related quality of life in older subjects.

This can be done by magic or by having sex, but if the Bonds are permanent, the individual cannot be released from the other's bond without the consent of that person. As a side note, you can't release your own soul from your own Bond, however, you can release your soul from a soulbond and that Bond is now gone and you must re-bond with
