Much of today's chemical industry is dependent on the processing of bulk reactants such as particulate solids. These solids are typically obtained as a byproduct of a metal refinery process. Typically, this byproduct is a mixture of a metal or an alloy, a mineral, a ceramic, or another compound formed from processing a bulk material. For example, a metal refinery process such as pyrometallurgy will generally yield a mixture of metal oxides, metal alloys and other waste products. The metals, alloys and other waste products are often carried in a slag that can be discharged as a waste stream. The waste stream is generally not an easily disposed-of slag
