In Photoshop CS6, the application introduced the concept of a workflow which allows you to choose a workflow and save it. So you can have a different one depending on what camera you use or what the lighting was. While I'm not a fan of the workflow concept, for some reason, developers liked the concept so much that they decided to make it even more complex. Photoshop CS6_User-Created Workflow is a installable package that you have to download, install, and restart the program when you're done. Then you have to keep the workflow installed and running while doing all your work. It's like having a couple different browsers on your PC keeping track of your Web history; I don't know if you have experienced this but it's aggravating. Having said that, I am a total fan of Photoshop and Lightroom. Especially Lightroom as one of the best platforms for organizing and managing images. However, it will never live up to the expectations of potential customers. That's not necessarily a bad thing, though. It's just a fact of life. With that, let's take a closer look at Lightroom for Photographers! Create multipage PDF documents, which are great for art, poster, and office documents with the new Create PDF feature.
